COOK AND COUNTESS.

Patty Cowslip, the only daughter of the Rev. Peter Cowslip vicar of Mud-dlesworth-in-the-Marsh, was a pretty girl. She was so pretty that she might have actually aspired, though she had not a penny in the world, to marrying a fashionable curate. But though Patty was penniless she was ambitious, and she had not the slightest idea of marry ing the most fashionable of curates.

It is not necessary to describe what Patty was like. "Rather above than below the ordinary height," as novelists say, rich chestnut hair with a glint of gold in it, an excellent if re, small ears, brown eyes with dark eyebrows and lashes, pearly teeth set in the rosy frame of a pair of lips arched like Cupid's bow, a round and dimpled chin, a swanlike neck—bah! we have all once in our lives met somebody as charming as Miss Patty Cowslip; but as a rule the experience has not been repeated. We must not forget, though that Miss Patty's arms and hands were her strong point; a queen might have envied them, for they were absolutely perfect. Miss Patty Cowslip had had a decent education; but beyond the annual subsidy of ten pounds sterling a year which the parish paid her for playing the organ she had not a penny in the world.

managed to pay his tradesmen at the year's end; but the Rev. Peter dined very day much better than many millionaires. And why? Was it on account of the poor clergyman's wicked extravagance? Not a bit of it; the fact is that Patty was a splendid cook—a born genius for the noblest of the arts.

Many modern young ladies, having purchased a terra cotta jar and rendered it hideous with daubs of paint, compel their friends to fall down and worship it. and call it art; other girls torment us with the piano, violin, banjo, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer and all kinds of music; other girls sing. All these peo ple work their wicked wills upon us with impunity We grin, we say, "Oh, thank you so much," because we are obliged to do that; and our politeness is treated as an encore, and then our sufferings re

Pretty Patry Cowslip did none of these dreadful things; but she could cook like Ude, Francatelli and Soyer rolled into And Pretty Patty went up to town. J. N. Morgan's Book Store, entered the School of Cookery, and came out as the senior wrangler of the year. It was Patty first, the rest nowhere. Monsieur Caramel, the professor of ornamental pastry, proposed to her at once; CHEMICAL AND ANALYTICAL LABORATORIES but Patty refused him, for, as we have said, she was ambitious And then Miss Cowslip issued a neat little advertisement, took modest lodgings in a modest West End street, and began to teach on

His lordship was a great sufferer from indi-gestion, and he was dying of bad dinners. No cook ever staid more than a nonth in his house; each of his daughters ruled the roast for a week, and generally the particular young lady appened to be responsible for the dinner on any given evening left the room in tears before the dessert was put upon the School and College Text table. "And we've never even heard of there!" sighed Lady Ermyntrude. So it was arranged that Patty was to come the next day and teach them how to make apple dumplings, for which she was to receive a fee of one guinea; and, as a personal favor, she wrote them a charming little menu, in which among the sweet dishes appeared the item
"Apple dumplings a la George Trois."

At 2 o'clock the next day Miss Cowslip was shown into their ladyships' boudoir A clean white cloth, by Patty's direction was laid upon the round table in the center of the room, flour water, a dish of apples, some brown sugar, some cloves a pastry board and a basin were brought in by Adolphus John, the six foot foot man, and then each of the Ladies Casse role, provided with a silver knife, began to peel an apple

Poor things they couldn't even do that properly But Patty Cowslip, who had taken off her hat and gloves, laid aside her jacket and donned a natty little Swiss apron, trimmed with Russian em broidery, rolled up her sleeves and dis-played her magnificent arms, and demonstrated the proper way to peel an apple to the delight, astonishment and admira-tion of the Ladies Casserole; and when she was in the middle of the process the door opened and Lord Fleshpotts entered dies' and Children's Patty smiled. ("What teeth!" thought
